If you've spent any amount of time browsing the Internet or blogosphere, you've probably come across reviews of many software applications. Popularity is a subjective term, but sometimes it seems like there are too many reviews, and not enough choices to be made. While you might not be able to narrow things down to a single name, you should be able to make your decision much easier by comparing software reviews. There are a number of sites you can visit to find reviews of various products on the Internet. You can find reviews of music production programs at reviews.com, reviews of e-books at popularbookreviews.com, and reviews of different video editing products at new-and-improved.com. However, you might have a difficult time finding reviews of software. Instead of browsing multiple websites to compare features and reviews, you can visit the software's website to see reviews. You can find a review of Nero Burning ROM at their website, reviews of ImagingPro at its website, reviews of Adobe Lightroom at their website, and reviews of LightScribe at the LightScribe website. You might find it a little strange that software companies aren't encouraging people to post reviews of their products, but in truth, software reviews aren't as valuable to the majority of people. No one is going to buy LightScribe as a result of someone's review of their product, and many people will never bother buying Nero Burning ROM or Lightroom as a result of a review they read. All software products have a rating in most software reviews, but that's the only benefit it has. A review of a piece of hardware like a camera, computer, printer, and so on, on the other hand, is generally more valuable because hardware tends to have a wide range of uses and is likely to appeal to at least one person. A good website will generally also have reviews of printers, cameras, computers, and so on, so you can make a comparison of their features against reviews from that site. You can also find reviews on specialized sites. You can find reviews of the Olympus Pen E-P5 at dpreview.com, reviews of the Nikon D5 at the DPreview website, and reviews of Canon's new G5 at phoronix.com. You can also find reviews on photo and video sites like flickr.com, blogspot.com, and YouTube. Software reviews are relatively easy to find on websites with specialized focuses. However, software reviews are not included on the
